The Meeting Mastery Workbook

Turn your next client meeting into decisions and action, not just another page of notes.

Three tools you can use in your very next meeting. Built for consultants and property professionals who run a lot of conversations and need every one of them to move something forward.

A short, practical extract from the full workbook

WHERE MEETINGS LEAK VALUE

Good conversations, then nothing moves

Most meetings end with goodwill and a vague sense of progress. Everyone nods, someone says they will circle back, and the room empties. Two weeks later the deal, the project or the appraisal has not moved. The value was created in the room. It leaked in the gap between the conversation and what actually got done.

Notes do not fix this on their own. Notes record what was said. They do not decide who owns what, by when, or why it matters. These three tools close that gap. Print this page, or keep it open, and use them in your next meeting.

Tool 1

The three question meeting filter

Run this before you send the invite. If a meeting cannot answer all three clearly, it is a message or a shared document, not a meeting.

1. Does this genuinely need a live conversation, or could a message or short document do the same job?

2. What single decision or outcome must exist by the time we finish the call?

3. Who owns the follow through, and do they know it yet?

Tool 2

The decision to action capture

This is the single habit that changes the most. During or straight after the meeting, capture every decision as a line with an owner, a due date and one line on why it matters. A decision with no owner and no date is a wish. Fill the rows below in your next meeting.

Decision made	Owner	Due	Why it matters

Worked examples

Consulting scoping call. Decision: proceed with a fixed price phase one. Owner: you. Due: proposal to client by Thursday. Why: client wants certainty before budget sign off closes this month.

Vendor appraisal. Decision: list at the agreed guide with professional photography. Owner: vendor to confirm, you to book. Due: photos Tuesday, live Friday. Why: two comparable listings launch next week and we want to be first to market.

Tool 3

The five line follow up

Send this within the hour, while the meeting is still warm. Five lines is enough. It confirms shared understanding, locks in ownership and quietly sets the next step. Draft yours here.

Purpose One line on what the meeting was for.

Decisions What we agreed.

Actions Who does what, by when.

Open questions Anything still unresolved.

Next contact When and how we speak again.

Doing this by hand every time is a lot

You do not have to. Notewright is a paste first workspace. Paste the transcript from whatever tool you already use, and it drafts the decisions, the actions with owners, and a follow up you can edit and send. It is capture agnostic, so it never sits inside your meeting or competes with the platform you run calls on. You stay in control of every word before it goes out.

GO DEEPER

Inside the full Meeting Mastery Workbook

These starter pages are a small slice. The full workbook is a practical system for making every meeting earn its place in your week. It covers:

- Designing the agenda so the outcome is decided before anyone joins.
- Running the room and keeping a conversation on purpose without being the person who kills the energy.
- Decision hygiene, so agreements do not quietly dissolve the moment the call ends.
- Follow through systems that turn talk into tracked action every single time.
- The meeting free alternatives, and knowing when a message, a document or an async update beats a live call.
- A templates library you can reuse for scoping calls, appraisals, reviews and client updates.
